Remote desktop gaming is great. Whether you're streaming a game from your desktop to your TV or laptop, or from a virtual desktop to a remote laptop or desktop, it provides a satisfying high-end remote gaming experience. Unfortunately, most remote desktop tools rely on a heavy client / server infrastructure that requires constant, high-bandwidth connections to the server. But when you're streaming a game, your connection will likely be spotty, inconsistent, and, in some cases, downright bad. That's why I designed Rainway: to help remote streamers get the best experience possible. Rainway takes control of your desktop computer, distributes it across multiple machines, and makes them run simultaneously. Using Rainway, you can tweak your remote gaming experience to always look and feel like you're sitting at home. You can even stream a game directly to your smartphone to continue playing while you're away from your gaming rig. So before you decide to add a new laptop to your collection, take a peek at this tool. It's definitely a game changer. It can detect Steam, Origin, Battle.net, Uplay and even Itch.io games automatically, and you will be able to launch them all from a single UI. Once everything has been set up, you can visit play.rainway.com from any other device, using a browser, connect to the host PC and start streaming games. The app even supports remote desktop control, though this function is disabled initially. A helpful side panel displays useful stream statistics, and hotkeys can be used to show or hide the overlay, toggle fullscreen mode and lock the mouse cursor inside the Rainway window. No game streaming service is like the real thing, but it comes close Now, don't expect to play a fast-paced multiplayer game and remain competitive when using this service. With a good Internet connection, input lag will be minimal, but still a lot higher than on your home computer. There is no way to get around this, but the service is still suitable for games where not every millisecond counts. If your Internet connection is unstable or slow,
