Postman is an efficient and free client-side software for sending all types of emails. Its key characteristics are: to send faxes and letter with regular appointment and signature, to set up a rule to remind you periodically of important matters or to support specific forms. Also, Postman can be used to send emails and attachments with the traditional postal services for free with no more compatibility issues. The classic mail sender cannot be compared to the program's ease of use and will certainly irritate its users. The application doesn't support all the email features that modern email clients like Thunderbird or Firefox have to offer, but it's still the most complete replacement. The interface consists of four main panels that can be arranged as you wish. In the first you can set the regular email settings such as the account or the sender. In the second, you can set up the sender profile. This is used when you want to define a particular send according to your needs. The third panel enables you to set up a profile for regular appointment and signature requests, something that classic mail clients don't have. If you need to send documents with regular appointments, this is surely the most ideal choice. The last panel is where you set the rules for periodic reminders. Postman enables you to create time-sensitive rules according to specific hours or months. Postman supports attaching of any kind of file with the email, whether it's a regular letter or a scanned image. This enables you to perform all of your daily tasks from a single application. The panel also enables you to search for the addresses of your contacts to send out emails and attach the attachments accordingly. Postman is a free client-side software that should be in your toolkit if you want to send emails and attachments regularly. Even the most reliable mail service can fail at times. If the admin user tries to use my plugin before it's complete it will produce a null pointer exception. The plugin is.wait() so it should at the very least wait until the async task is complete, but it makes no difference. I tried to.wait() on my plugin, which does not work either. if (User.HasAccessToPlugin("L")){ .. async code .. finish(); } A: You need to run your plugin's initialization code in a separate thread, so it can be paused/canceled/finished manually at any time. I think that Apple's documentation for NSOperationQueue may be of help, explaining the following code: -(BOOL)main { NSOperationQueue* queue = [[NSOperationQueue alloc] init]; queue.maxConcurrentOperationCount = 1; // Create multiple operations to run on a separate thread. [queue addOperationWithBlock:^{ // Do some async task // Start the operation, complete when done [someOperation start];
