It finds particular application in conjunction with detecting low levels of contaminants, such as oil and/or heavy metals, on a drum surface, and will be described with particular reference thereto. It should be appreciated, however, that the invention is also applicable to detecting contaminants on other surfaces. Drums and drumskins are well known materials processing components. They are usually configured with an inside metal liner that is coated with a plastic membrane or the like for the purpose of waterproofing. The membrane is normally worn down over time and can then be replaced or worn down to the metal layer. In order to prevent accumulation of dirt and/or contaminants on the membrane, the drum is typically vacuumed and a fluid is applied to the drum. Some contaminants, such as fluid, can be detected before the membrane or liner is damaged. Typically, the contaminants will accumulate on the edge of the drum. In some cases, the contaminants have been detected through the use of a high intensity light source and a charge coupled device (CCD). In addition, in some cases,
