Note Many programs use the term _color_ when they really mean _gray-scale_. In most cases, Photoshop's "color" means a dithered combination of colors, whereas other programs (especially those that model look like early film cameras) use the term _color_ to mean a full-color, non-dithered image. You can find more on dithering and other color-processing principles in the box on Discrete Dithering. ## Resizing and Cropping Use the Image Size tools (the Resize tool and the Crop tool) to resize your image for the web or to fit a space on a page, as described on Cropping Pictures. ## Blending Layers Blending is one of the most important image-editing techniques, enabling you to put subtle objects or colors over a solid-color image—say, your photo—to create interesting effects. You can use blending to make an image shine, change an image's tint, combine two images to create one image, or pull out a unique effect from a photographic image. Photoshop gives you a dizzying array of options to perform blending, but the easiest way to work with layers is to use the Layers palette. You can load an image into the Layers palette, and then use the tools on the menu bar to blend a particular layer over

Q: Using Two Labels to Count the Number of Questions This may seem a bit difficult to accomplish (especially with html), but I'm trying to have a large number of questions below one specific section in the middle of a page. I know I can do a loop to display them with php, but I wanted to accomplish this with html only. I have this very simple html setup: How do you get a perfect score in a quiz? Y N How do you get a perfect score in a quiz? A: Y A: N B: Y B: N I'd like the for the buttons to be associated with the corresponding radio buttons. But, if any question is not answered correctly, the span next to the incorrect answer should increase in value, and a counter in the same id for the span should display a number. So, in the end, it would look like this: How do you get a perfect score in a quiz? 0 0

Habitable Zone of Mars Could Be as Small as It Was for Early Life on Earth Ed Yong NASA, 22 May 2017 "It's plausible that early life might have been found on Mars, if Mars was just as wet as Earth," says Jonathan Lunine, a leading proponent of the astrobiological search for life elsewhere. A Martian surface that's similar to early Earth could have sustained the development of life, according to Jonathan Lunine, a planetary scientist and astrobiologist at the University of Arizona and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, who led the research. "It's plausible that early life might have been found on Mars, if Mars was just as wet as Earth," says Lunine. "And that would be good news for astrobiology." His findings provide a new estimate for the number of habitable planets within the Milky Way Galaxy. His team calculated how many Mars-mass planets with liquid water on their surface are capable of sustaining a similar climate to Earth. "The early Earth may have been remarkably wet, too wet for life, but perhaps Mars was not that different. We may have found a habitable Mars," says Lunine. Because Mars' surface water has long since evaporated, it is thought to be too hostile for life today. But, to find out whether liquid water once extended across the Martian landscape, researchers used computer models and climate data to predict what Mars' climate might have been like billions of years ago. Computer models show that the early climate would have sustained extensive surface water as glaciers and large polar ice sheets melted. These factors would have flowed into a series of lakes, providing liquid water for microorganisms. Lunine and his team compared this early climate to Earth to assess how wet Mars' surface could have been. They combined the current estimates for how much water is locked in the world's frozen surface with estimates for how much water is hidden beneath the planet's surface—hydrothermal reservoirs and carbonates—to estimate just how much of the planet's surface could have been wet. "Earth is really an outlier in terms of its habitability," says Lunine. "If you wanted to start making a case for life, you would want to find a few planets that are as similar to Earth as Mars." The researchers used Earth's current atmospheric composition and climate, including the solar
