Download:Â Carcinoma of the uterine cervix in intravenous drug abusers: a histopathologic study of 119 cases. The incidence of the typical clinical presentation of carcinoma of the cervix in intravenous (IV) drug abusers is rare. This study was undertaken to define the pathologic patterns of these tumors. One hundred nineteen cervical tumors from 115 IV abusers were studied. There were 72 squamous cell carcinomas, 2 cervical adenocarcinomas, 36 adenosquamous carcinomas, and 9 small cell or anaplastic carcinomas. Seventy-eight percent of the squamous carcinomas had typical squamous cell carcinoma features, and 82% of these cases also had immunohistochemical evidence of human papillomavirus (HPV) infection. Seventy-two percent of the adenosquamous carcinomas had HPV infection but had neither squamous cell nor keratinizing squamous cell carcinoma patterns. The two cervical adenocarcinomas were not HPV positive. Most of the small cell/anaplastic carcinomas (80%) were positive for HPV. Typical squamous cell carcinoma of the cervix is the most common clinical presentation of malignant neoplasia of the cervix in IV drug abusers. Morphologic features, including the presence of HPV, are sufficiently characteristic to allow pathologic differentiation from metastatic squamous cell carcinoma of the cervix. HPV infection may be useful in the diagnosis of this tumor and in the potential treatment of cervical adenocarcinomas.
