Following on from the budget deal and the Gov't. timeline, the Government has wasted another opportunity to turn its attention to strengthening the economy for the long term. A case in point - making temporary concessions to an unreformed Labour Party. First up, we need to ensure that the Budget grows the economy. Many of the austerity measures made during the last budget are still in place and they have been shown to have no effect on real GDP. Labour's suggestion to now create an economy wide National Income Tax to replace the past 30 years of HST is an unworkable idea. The idea that we can phase it in so the additional revenue will support new investments during the phase in period is a noble one, but no governments since 1987 have ever successfully implemented the NIT. When businesses have a better guess to where the extra tax will come from, they will change their behaviour to reduce revenues. Who can name all the prominent Labour politicians who have admitted that they failed to give the full tax cut that they said would last for the 'next 25 years'? All have done the same. Governments cannot continually fail to improve the business climate and expect to gain loyalty from the public. The Government is convinced that it is doing the right thing for the economy, I am not. The Budget does nothing to grow the economy and will make things even worse. Government spending on the economy is at a rate of 2.8% of GDP, but for the past four years spending has been even higher. The only reason we have
