So I was playing with the CRON module in python today and discovered that after a few minutes the object that was added to it was no longer present, even if the program was still executing. Am I missing something or this is the expected way of doing it, especially when it comes to error handling? A: The function `__del__` provides a hook for the object to clean up itself when its still alive (usually when you explicitly tell the garbage collector to clean it up), see Python docs: A function which is called when a bound method, instance, class, instance method, generator, or thread object is about to be garbage-collected. Functions called in this manner become associated with the object. After the function returns, the object is freed. If the associated object is still alive when this function returns, it becomes eligible for garbage collection. In this situation, it cannot be garbage-collected immediately, though, because it is still reachable within the global namespace. When garbage collection is performed, the associated objects then become garbage-collected, and the function's reference to the associated objects becomes invalid. Note that this function is called when the object is about to be garbage-collected, but not at the moment it is actually garbage-collected, so it is not useful for cleaning up after the garbage collection. It is called when the call stack is preparing to be unwound. From the docs:

Note The `__del__()` method is used by the garbage collector to release the memory allocated for objects more transparently. It is called when the reference count of an object reaches zero; this includes the case where it is directly or indirectly referenced by another object whose reference count reaches zero. Since you found that the object doesn't become deleted, this might be a bug (or a feature, but probably not). But in any case, remember that you don't have to do anything special for objects
