When I first opened Lightroom on my Windows 10 desktop with the Core i7 processor, the display settings were a little larger than I expected. I was using the Default setting of 127.5 DPI, but the Display Modifier bar at the bottom was indicating that I was using 110 DPI, while the primary screen was 120 DPI. By changing the setting to 125 DPI, I got an excellent display. I never noticed that setting before, but it's a nice plus. The DPI in the Windows 10 Desktop app setting impacts image size and vertical display space. When I opened Lightroom in my real-life test, I discovered that the workspace wasn't quite so large as I had anticipated. The file size of my test images was 4.1GB, but the new workspace was only 4.3GB. I was a little surprised to see that change. I'm not sure whether that indicates a change in the way the app works or simply that Lightroom was trying to compensate for fewer pixels. The change was more obvious when I tested with the iPad Pro, where the workspace was larger, but not much larger. The issue with the lower DPI, notice, is not a problem in the Windows 10 desktop app but on an iPad, where the default setting is 150. I see many good reasons to always shoot photos at the right size, especially when the finished image will be viewed on a computer screen, on an HDTV, online, or on a phone and app. I'm confident that Lightroom will present my images to me, or my viewers in a wonderful, clear fashion, whatever the resolution or the picture size.
